FREE KIT · DIGITAL PRODUCTS

FREE KIT

Stop circling. Finish one.

The four product types worth starting with, the offer to write before you build, and the one-week build that gets your first one into a checkout link.

01
The four product types

02
Offer before the product

03
The one-week build

01

The four product types worth starting with

You don't need to invent a new category. Each of these is fast to make and solves one clear problem. Pick the one you already know and can make this week.

Templates

SOLVES
A blank-page problem

BEST FOR
A repeatable task

Planners

SOLVES
A structure problem

BEST FOR
A recurring routine

Short guides

SOLVES
A "how do I" problem

BEST FOR
A skill you have

Prompt packs

SOLVES
A starting-point problem

BEST FOR
A tool you use daily

How to pick yours: make the thing you already made for yourself. The spreadsheet, the checklist, the swipe file. You've done the hard part. Polishing it for someone else is the easy half.

02

The offer comes before the product

Nobody buys "a PDF." They buy the hour it saves them, the decision it makes for them, the mess it cleans up. So design the offer first: a specific outcome, for a specific woman, at a specific price. Building first is why beautiful products sit unsold.

File or offer? "A 30-page template" is a file. "The system that plans your entire content month in one sitting" is an offer. Same file. A completely different thing to buy.

Can you picture the moment? Name, in one sentence, the exact moment someone reaches for it. "The planner you open on Sunday night when the week already feels behind." If you can't picture it, the idea isn't sharp enough yet.

Your offer is ready when:

- ☐ You can name the exact outcome in one sentence
- ☐ You can picture the exact woman who needs it
- ☐ You've chosen the lightest format that delivers it
- ☐ You've set a price you can say out loud without flinching

The common mistake: building for six weeks in private, then launching to silence. You learn nothing in those six weeks except how to hide. One rough product in front of one real person beats a flawless one no one has seen.

If you can't finish "this gets you from ___ to ___," you're not ready to build. You're ready to think.

03

The one-week build

The build is smaller than the fear around it. One problem, one format, one afternoon, one checkout link. Fill in the pink parts first. That sentence is your offer, and your product name comes straight out of it.

This gets [the exact woman: who she is] from [where she's stuck] to [the outcome she wants].

She reaches for it [the moment: e.g. Sunday night when the week already feels behind].

Format: [template / planner / short guide / prompt pack]
Name: [a name that tells her what it does]
Price: [one you can say out loud without flinching]

1. Pick one problem you can solve on paper.
2. Choose the lightest format that solves it.
3. Build the draft in one afternoon.
4. Set a price you can say out loud.
5. Make one checkout link and a delivery file. Now it exists.

THEN MAKE ONE PIN

Name it so the name alone says what it does → make a single pin that points at it → it becomes a searchable answer to a real question, found by strangers through the problem it solves, not through you.

Done is the whole goal this week. Perfectionism is procrastination in a nicer outfit. You can't improve a thing that doesn't exist. Version one exists so version two can be smart.