The four jobs to hand AI first

You don't need to rebuild your business around AI. Start with the four places it saves the most time. You already do every one of these by hand, slowly.

Drafting

YOU GIVE
The angle and the audience

IT RETURNS
A first draft for you to shape

Repurposing

YOU GIVE
One article

IT RETURNS
Pins, emails and posts

Summarising

YOU GIVE
A long report or video

IT RETURNS
The parts that matter

Structuring

YOU GIVE
Messy notes

IT RETURNS
A clear outline

The rule: AI carries out a decision you've already made. You choose the angle, the product, the direction. It does the miles.

02

The four-part brief

Brief AI the way you'd brief a new hire on her first day. There is no magic word. A good brief is just complete. When something comes back flat, the fix is almost never a cleverer prompt. It's a fuller one.

Role

Who it should be. "A warm email copywriter for a faceless brand."

Reader

Who it's for. The specific woman on the other end.

Task

Exactly what you want made, and how many.

Standard

What "good" looks like, and what to avoid.

In one line: "Write a caption" gets a shrug. "You're my brand's voice, warm and a little wry. Write three captions for a woman scared to start. Short sentences, no hype." gets something you can use.

Your brief is ready when:

- [ ] You've told it who to be, not just what to do
- [ ] You've named the exact reader on the other end
- [ ] You've shown it one example of "good" if you have one
- [ ] You've said what to avoid, not only what to include

The quality of what you get back is the quality of what you put in. Always.

03

Your plug-and-play prompt

Copy this into ChatGPT or Claude. Swap the pink parts for your details. Save it somewhere permanent, and next week just change the topic.

You are [my brand's voice: three words, e.g. warm, a little wry, direct].

You're writing for [the woman on the other end: who she is and what she's stuck on].

Write [what you want: e.g. three Instagram captions / one newsletter intro / five pin titles] about [this week's topic].

Good looks like: [e.g. short sentences, one clear idea, ends with a question].
Avoid: [e.g. hype, emojis, "in today's fast-paced world"].

Here is one example of something I liked: [paste it, or delete this line]

1. Run it once and read what comes back as the editor, not the author.
2. If it's flat, add more to the brief, not cleverer words.
3. Ask yourself: would I have said it this way? If not, it's a draft waiting for your hand.
4. Save the finished prompt. That saved brief is your first real system.

THE WEEKLY LOOP

Write one strong brief for a task you repeat → save it where you can find it → each week, swap in the new topic → edit the draft with your own hand → and the work that ate an afternoon takes twenty minutes.

Where AI stops and you start: it can draft, summarise and structure. The taste to know what's good, the direction, and the final read before anything goes out stay with you.
