FREE KIT · PINTEREST

FREE KIT

Pins don't go viral. They rank.

The five parts of a pin that gets clicked, the keyword trick that puts you in front of women already searching, and the rhythm that queues weeks of pins in one sitting.

01
The five parts of a pin

02
Finding the exact phrases

03
The batching rhythm

01

The five parts of a pin that gets clicked

A pin has one job: stop the scroll and earn the click. These five parts decide whether it does.

The image

1000×1500, vertical, readable at thumbnail size on a phone

The title

Your keyword, plus a promise. Outcome beats topic.

The description

Written the way you'd write for Google, keyword placed naturally

The keywords

The same phrase on the pin, the board title and the board description

The landing

A page you control that delivers on the pin's promise. Otherwise you build Pinterest's asset.

The rule: no pin gets designed until its keyword is chosen. Design serves search, never the reverse.

02

Find the exact phrases she types

Pinterest serves whatever best answers the search, whoever published it. Your follower count is close to irrelevant. Your keyword coverage is everything. And the whole tool is free, sitting in the search bar.

Autocomplete

Type your topic and let Pinterest finish the sentence. Those suggestions are real searches.

Guided tiles

Run the search and read the tiles across the top. Each one is a subtopic women want.

Long tail

"Pinterest" can't be won. "Pinterest marketing for bloggers" can. Specific beats broad.

A bank, not a pile

Per pillar: a head term, a cluster of mid-tail phrases, a long tail of specific searches.

The test: if a phrase doesn't show up in autocomplete, it isn't a keyword, however clever it sounds.

Your keyword is in place when it's in all five layers:

- ☐ Pin title
- ☐ Pin description
- ☐ Board title and board description
- ☐ The page the pin links to

> A woman searching a five-word phrase knows exactly what she wants.

03

The batching rhythm

Pinterest rewards accounts that show up steadily, and it's forgiving about what steadily means. A pace you can hold for a year beats a heroic month followed by silence. Here is the one weekly sitting.

1. Pick the article and the keywords first. Keywords before everything.
2. Design in Canva against saved templates at 1000×1500. I rotate six, not sixty.
3. Make several fresh pins per article: different images, different headline angles, all pointing at the same page.
4. Write keyword-layered titles and descriptions for each one.
5. Queue them in Pinterest's free native scheduler. One sitting. Fourteen days. Done.
6. Set them to go out evenings and weekends, when she's browsing, not when you're working.

THE WEEKLY LOOP

One article → five fresh pins → two weeks queued in one sitting → once a month, ask which three pins drove the most outbound clicks → make more of that.

Be honest about the clock: Pinterest is slow. Plan for a quarter of steady publishing before you judge it. It's what you build while something faster pays the bills.

A post is a firework. A pin is an asset.